BRAVERY IN BATTLE.

HOW IT FEELS TO STAND UP AND BE SHOT AT.

Some Queer Experiences on the Field in the Confederate Ranks-No Murderous Feeling in a Long-Hange Fight.

Shirry la Washington Republican. Many a time I have been asked, "How does a soldier feel when in actual combat?" From my personal experience I can only may that it depends upon circumstances. The feeling of vengeance is utterly absent is a class contest between opposing regiments. As a rule, during our civil war the men never approached within twenty yards of each other-one side or the other giving way. When it is considered that our rifles carried a ball nearly a mile, and that the tactics were to advance firing, it may be seen that a great loss of life might happen before the actual grapple of the contenting forces.

I don't mean to say that there were no bayonet fights or actual personal encounter-, but they were few and far between. When they did occur it was with blind fary (for instance, on the occasion of Pickett's charge at Gettysburg), where crossed bayonets and clubbed muskets were brought into play. There neither side asked quarter nor gave it. It was a simple knock down and drag out fight, in which the Virginians had to give way because of the overpowering numbers and artillery brought against them.

A NEW EXPERIENCE. Now, I recollect distinctly (without naming the battles) that during the seven days' battles in front of Richmond in 1862 we were on the offensive. Before that we had been strictly on the defensive. It was a ne m experience, too, to us, because before period we had always been on the defensive. That country (the Chickahominy and its affluents) was densely wooded with scrub underbrush, and in marching in battle order regiments, and even companies, would be separated from each other in avoiding the obstacles to an advance. That sort of thing was very trying to the nerves of the men, because the skirmishers were out of sight of the main advance, and even when they met. the outlying posts of the enemy the infantry line was not notified. Now, there was a situation in which the best troops might be tried. It is of the subsequent battles, including all the battles of the army of northern Virginia up to the campaign of 1864 that I can deal with. I recollect the preliminaries of two or three battles as distinctly as I do the events of yesterday, and I recollect more-over how I felt when the order to strip for tattle was given. But what I wish to give an idea of is the conduct of a regiment when in actual battle. There are three battles in which I was engaged that especially recur to my memory, for the reason that the fighting was fierce and the loss on both sides heavy-those were Frazier's Farm, second Manassas and Seven Pines-I mean to state that in these battles our regiment lost most heavily. Before the latter of these battles some of my comrades were immediately behind the fighting line, and before they could roll up their blankets they were called into the fight by their offi-

THE PASSION OF BATTLE.

The old story to the effect that the boys learn in the columns of the "Æneid"-when e of the coldier iraque mentem precipitant," had no exhibition in the contest of the war between the states, or between these men in line of battie. The men as a rule stool off and shot at long range at each other. When they got to close quarters, and they were fighting body to body and man to man, then of course, as I have above stated, there were angry passions developed by the contest-ants which did not apply to the body proper of the armies on both sides in any occasional engagement. In the old days it was shield to shield, and spear to spear, and sword to sword. The best man was he who was the strongest and most skillful. Now, we can kill each other 1,000 yards range. don't know that I can better give an idea of the improved methods of modern warfare than when I state that in the charge of Pickett's division at Gettysburg the entire force was decimated long before they got within reach of the opposing batteries.

I wish to give instances of the peculiar bearing of the men in the battles wherein my regiment was engaged. For instance: When after the battle of Gaines' Mill (the second day of the seven day's fight in front of Richmond) there were numbers of the Union dead and wounded around and about our bivouae, we did what we could for them in the way of giving water and melicines, etc., but, as far as I can recall my sensations, we paid no more attention to them than is usually done by spectators to a herd of slaughtered bullocks.

I recollect well the bushing and crowding attendant upon an advance over rough ground. It was almost impossible to keep the alignment of a dress parale, and under the fire of the artillery gaps were constantly being made in the ranks. Friend and for we pushed over, disregarding all ppeals for help until we had attained the ammit of that which we had been ordered to drive at by our generals. It is certainly a fact that, as a rule, the men on the other when they were drawn up to fight had a cretty good inkling of the work mapped cut for them.

PROFANITY-DISORDER-VALOR. Finally, as for troops in actual bettle, I have this much to say, that I never saw more profanity than in the standing up of a regiment anywhere. A missionary would have but small chance for a conversion. It is distinctly in my memory, for instance, that at the battle of Williamsburg, and the battle of the Seven Pines thereafter, the men in my brigade swore "like the army in Planders." In fight the men were like "wild bulls of Bashan," and the file-closers, of whom I was one at that time, had hard work to keep them in order. Before the order was given them to advance they were quiet enough; but thereafter, in spite of all rders abjurgations, and prayers of the offeer , commissioned and non-commissioned, they would crowd in toward the centre, and thus were rendered in a measure incompe-test with the best action of our whole force. Again I recollect that in the middle of of the hottest battles of the war, in INIL, the captain of a company told a sergeant that the ammunition was giving out. The sergeant left his position and darted for the ammunition train. He got his cartridges and started back, but on the way a shell exploded near him and ignited his cartridges, wounding and lacerating him saverely about the face and body. When he was lifted from under the debris the first question he asked was, "Did I get 'em in all right !" Now, it has been my fortune to have been in more than a dozen pitched battles, and in double the number of skirmishes that, as far as the combatants were concerned, approached almost to the dignity of a battle, and I never saw as yet a man flinch from his duty. When the fight was raging, and comrades were falling on every Side, I never saw any of the rest of the men drop out to carry them back.
